Mathematical and Physical Errors of Wald in General Relativity

Abstract

In spite of including several errors, Wald's book has become a standard reference, in part, because he made the same mistakes as the 1913 Nobel Prize Committee for physics. He also has misrepresented Einstein's equivalence principle, Maxwell's equations, the existence of dynamic and static solutions for the Einstein equations, and the derivation for weak gravity and the perturbation approach. Another problem is that he failed to see the consistency of Einstein's covariance principle in physics. This is due to that in spite of his being additionally cautious, Wald was often not able to fill the difference between mathematics and physics. Although his own errors have been shown in the literature, since there is no way not have the mathematical background in the time to go through them. In this paper, his errors are illustrated and explained in mathematics at the undergraduate level.
